USSR - West Germany: The Scheel delegation's initial attempts to make substantive alterations in the Bahr-Gromyko agreements on the form of a FRG-USSR treaty have run into a stone wall.

25X1

Gromyko specifically ruled out any mention in a Soviet - West German treaty of four-power rights, and rejected any attempt to draw a direct connection between the German-Soviet talks and the four-power sessions on Berlin. The Soviets especially voiced strong opposition to any changes in the paragraph of the Bahr-Gromyko "basic principles" that relate to the issue of existing borders. These points were raised by Scheel in order to make the draft more acceptable to domestic critics.

The Russians were [ ] firm but polite, and they showed some flexibility on matters they considered nonessential. Moscow agreed, for example, to consider additions concerning future bilateral cooperation in various fields. [ ]
